

Essay #1 Feedback Reflection

1. Feedback Grid (Based on the "How-To Receive Feedback" table from the ENL Peer Review Guide)

Feedback Received	Evaluation of Feedback (Do you agree?)	Plan to Address	Timeline
"As the reader, I know nothing about you. Maybe give a little context on your background. What is your first language?" and "How is it obvious?"	I agree. I assumed the reader would understand my personal context, but my "hook" needs more specific background to be effective.	I will add a brief explanation in my introduction regarding what my native language is and why Maya Angelou's poetry initially felt difficult to read compared to it.	N/A
"As the reader, I am confused as to what collection of poetry you are going to be analyzing in this essay because you did not make a clear statement about it."	I completely agree. The Peer Review Guide notes that all reviews must introduce the collection and provide a central argument. I only named specific poems.	I will revise my introduction to explicitly name the poetry collection(s) that "Still I Rise" and "Caged Bird" belong to, establishing a clearer foundation for my analysis.	N/A
"In what book?" (Referring to "Caged Bird")	I agree. This aligns with the previous comment. I need to properly contextualize where these poems were published.	When introducing the poems, I will ensure I state the specific collections they were published in.	N/A

"Lots of good analysis here" and "Good connection to overarching theme"	I agree. I feel my strongest work is in the middle of the essay where I analyze poetic terms like meter, enjambment, and metaphor.	I will keep the core of my analytical paragraphs, ensuring they continue to connect my breakdown of the poems to the broader themes of empowerment.	N/A

2. Reflection Questions

What patterns of feedback did you notice?

- The positive feedback consistently highlighted that my in-text analysis was strong and connected well to the overarching themes of the essay. However, the critical feedback revealed a pattern of missing context in my introduction. My reviewer noted that my personal opening lacked the necessary background about my first language, and more importantly, that I failed to clearly state which poetry collection I was actually analyzing.

What specific aspect of your draft is most important to address in your revision?

- The most important aspect to address is my introduction. Because I only introduced the specific poems ("Still I Rise" and "Caged Bird") rather than the collection as a whole, my reader was left confused.

What did you notice about your peer's papers that you might want to incorporate into your own draft?

- Looking at Ava Mitchell's essay on Gwendolyn Brooks, I noticed how effectively she handled her introduction. She immediately provided historical background on the poet, explicitly named the collection (Annie Allen), and delivered a very clear thesis regarding the collection's themes of urban poverty and female agency right in the first paragraph. Furthermore, Ava included proper formatting that I am currently missing, such as citing specific line numbers for her quotes (e.g., "(Brooks, 38)") and including a Works Cited page at the end of her document. I need to incorporate both of these elements to make my draft more professional.

What type of feedback, or specific questions, do you want me (Nick) to address in our one-on-one meeting?

- N/A
